Mas este o ápice - ou nadir- dos culto organizador? De acordo com alguns, a tendência foi longe demais. Estamos desordenando nossa paisagem mental aposta copa do mundo bet nossos esquemas para o descarte – dizem os especialistas - e quando as Associações Profissionais dos Organizadores lhe mandam colocar no chão um pórtico you know that you've already talked about this here!

"The constant need to accompany these organizational trends and the disaggregation is causing mental stress", says Siân Pelleschi, president of APDO. "As people are losing the ability to distinguish between a passing fashion or a method that can benefit the world: they experiment with overloads thanks to all these different techniques".

APDO is so worried about our effort every time more extreme for an exterior minimalist and well-organized, in the hope that it will lead to total interior happiness that it dedicates the National Organizer Week to the theme "back to basics".

"Our objective is to reduce the pressure on people to reach perfection, emphasizing progress instead", says Pelleschi. "We want to highlight that we must concentrate on needs and basic functions instead of the aesthetic appeal".

We are confusing our mental scenario with our own separation schemas, say specialists.

The fall and the organization have been a thing since long before the Netflix Tidying Up with Marie Kondo. But now it has reached heights without parallel intensity. The TikTok hashtag #CleanTok has more than 110.4 billion views. Never have domestic perfectionists removed so many things from their homes to put them in other containers!

The team behind the new Clean and Tidy Home Show on ExCel in London says that the increase in passion for extreme tidying has been exponential.

"Our event is a cleaning event, and although it may seem tedious to some people, the frequency has almost tripled in the three years we've been doing it - from 6,000 to 16,000 this year", says Michael Rossi.

The interest in the event is fueled throughout the year by their Shine Squad of cleaning and tidying influencers, who have a total of 9.5 million followers online.

"When I see people's faces at the event, I see joy", says Rossi. "It's a world where we live and organize a refrigerator, it's a pleasure then to go to it."

J'Nae Phillips, senior trends analyst and columnist for Fashioning says that these refreshed images are "a way for individuals to express their creativity in everyday spaces".

"Sharing images of aesthetically pleasing airports and meticulously organized social media is not about reducing identity to a simple snapshot", she says. "Instead of being reductive, these posts serve as micro-narratives in which we reconstruct and recreate our identities to align with contemporary trends where online presence is a significant extension of the self."

But Cassandra Jay, psychologist and founder of Empowered Life Planning (Life Capacity Planning), specialized in organization for busy women, says that the extreme use of methods used for simplification of our lives is causing a lot of stress instead of joy or creativity.

"Throwing things away up to this point is not conscious", she says. "Instead of this, the pressure of getting rid of our possessions and putting them in a box at the airport perfectly coordinated by color leads to exhaustion - and also people pretend that it was them who reached it or who they are? which sometimes leads to more stress".

Chris Wootton, owner of Poppies Cleaning franchise, the first company to professionalize cleaning in the UK, has seen many organizations within them in the last 44 years, also questioning the authenticity of the {img}s. "While organized, they offer benefits such as reducing food waste and better management; O tempoe os recursos necessários para manter tal ordem excessiva são muitas vezes impraticáveis à maioria as pessoas", diz ele."

Georgina Burnett, apresentadora de TV e estilista da casa celebridade também expressa preocupações sobre a natureza enganosa das mídias sociais.

"É, para dizer o mínimo que é muito estranho agora aspirarmos apresentar nossas vidas como sendo tão simples e isso pode ser definido pelo quê se encaixa aposta copa do mundo bet uma bandeja do aeroporto", diz ela.
